

Behaviour Flexibility

As a leader, awareness of self and others is the most critical factor there is. This awareness translates into a knowledge and understanding of the different types of people personalities and the way they will typically interact with each other and within a team or group.

Just as there are different people personality types that we must acknowledge and adapt to, there are also differing dimensions of emotional behavior that every leader must be aware of. Your emotions (your feelings) is your response to your thinking and mental patterns. Your thoughts (mental patterns), in turn, predict your behavior. A leader's emotional behavior style can compel followers to either connect and engage or to turn away.

My good friend and mentor, Dr. Michael Frisina, in his book "Influential Leadership – Change Your behavior, Change Your Organization, Change Health Care" (page 73), talks about emotional awareness and recognizes that emotionally aware leaders can acknowledge their gut reactions and prevent possible emotional meltdown. Emotionally aware leaders also are aware that negative responses are counterproductive to peak performance. He goes on to say, "... our behavior style can stir up emotions in others.

Behavioral style, or social/communication style, is the way we conduct ourselves in front of other people, particularly in the workplace. Are you friendly and warm? Are you reserved? Are you assertive? Are you in full control? Your behavioral style (which is different from personality) either attracts or repels other people, and vice versa. Sometimes we cannot articulate why we like or dislike someone's behavior, because these types of preferences are unconscious.

Four categories of behavioral styles are generally recognized. Note that each researcher assigns different names to the attributes

All of us have a dominant style, but we also have habits that fall into the other three categories. Each style has its strengths and weaknesses, and important consideration in team formation.

Identifying your own style and being aware of others' behavioral style contribute to your leadership success in several ways. First, this recognition improves your interaction and communication with others... Second, it allows you to showcase or model (and thus teach) the combination of behavioral styles that works best. Third, it gives you an opportunity to play to your strength ..."

Dr. Frisina stresses the need for leaders to be flexible. Awareness of the four categories of behavior styles tells us when to flex and adapt our style to be more effective in response to different people and different situations. One style is not effective for all situations. A rigid style will get us into trouble; style flexibility will help us be more effective. Twenty-five percent of all situations are perfect for our own personal style...it is the other 75% of the time that we need an awareness of emotional behavior in order to adjust our personal behavior style to move towards others and build trust. Performance excellence is possible only when we are keenly aware of our own behavior tendencies and habits (many of which exist at an unconscious level). There are three primary domains of workplace behavior – Self-awareness, Collaboration, and Connection – that comprise ten interdependent behavior principles common to each and every one of us. Behavior training in the three domains of self-awareness (which is a fundamental behavior competency), collaboration (which is a relational behavior competency), and connection (which is an operational behavior competency) is a systematic, programmatic methodology in real time on the job, and is best supported by coaching.

The skill of Positive Presence equips us to cultivate a positive emotional behavior that will move us toward others to combine for a positive and energized synergy in the work environment around us.

And remember, Positive Presence is the skill of adjusting and creating a positive and energized mindset within our self through conscious thought processes.

We can assess our personal energy flow through our feelings.

Feelings such as happiness and optimism can be linked to a positive energy flow, and feelings such as anger and frustration can be linked to a negative energy flow

We can control our feelings with our thoughts.

It is through our thought process that we choose how to behave.

And the bottom line is the measurable result of a person's energy flow is reflected by one's choice of behavior.
